Quantum computing: confirmation is on the way

In a month when we are working on updating our own encryption algorithms NIST has organised a competition for public-key algorithms to secure against a quantum computer.

To us this signals the real dawn of quantum computing; the issue being that any of today's encryption methods will be feeble against the new machines.

The NIST competition has been published, see here for more details:

AI is to give or take our jobs?

AI (artificial intelligence [aka machine learning/expert systems]) is looming ever more closer each year. In a pessimistic view few jobs are safe from this encroachment, almost all can and will be automated: Doctors, Lawyers (hooray!), managers, accountants, etc. However, it may not be all doom and gloom.

There will be many new jobs created supporting this new tech, much like Wired have highlighted:

In the future we will need lots of babysitters for robots, and tech support for driver-less vehicles when they fail to move (or will they provide a big red reset button that the occupants can push to reboot the system).
